Documentary Working Class Rock Star makes that office job not look so bad

Filmmaker Justin McConnell had no problem relating to the starving artists portrayed in Working Class Rock Star. McConnell financed, filmed and edited his documentary/industry exposé in between paid gigs making commercials and electronic press kits for record labels, and he figures he'll be paying off the debts for awhile. "Trying to make a feature film from pocket money and limited independent investments leads to a lot of nights scrounging for change under the couch cushions so you have enough money to buy bread," he laments. "For better or worse, I approached making this film the way a band at this level would go about making an album now: shoot first and figure out the distribution later."

According to McConnell, he initially envisioned Working Class Rock Star as a project about casual musicians and hobbyists. After filming a series of live performances and interviews with Dog Fashion Disco, McConnell was inspired to take another approach. The finished product explores the common struggles of young turks 3 Mile Scram, mid-career band Bloodshoteye and veteran act Tub Ring. The DVD—scheduled for wide release on November 11—also includes eye-opening interviews with dozens of other hard rock and metal musicians pontificating on the state of the music industry. "That's the fun of documentary," quips McConnell. "It's never the same film in the end that you planned on making, because you simply can't plan life."

Keyboardist Rob Kleiner, who scored the film and appears onscreen throughout as a member of Tub Ring, was pleased with McConnell's holistic approach with Working Class Rock Star: "The camera was there during band fights, rehearsals, travelling, writing, and dealing with record labels and agents and managers. It really captures what it's like to have to fight for your dreams." Three years after McConnell concluded principal shooting, Tub Ring are still kicking around the circuit. Some bands featured in the documentary—like Byzantine and Strapping Young Lad—are not. McConnell, like most of his subjects, is equally cynical and hopeful about the future. "It's going to be up to this new generation of artists and labels to really sit down and figure out where to go from here," he notes. "The old label paradigm is dead, and it's time to adapt to change or die holding onto memories of hookers, blow and limousines." —NICK GREEN
